

This week we made our group's social contract. I felt that we all made vital contributions to the contract, and am pleased with the end result. I think we as a group have a good starting point with great opportunities to help each other. Hopefully the amount of conflicts within our group will be zero, but that might not be a realistic goal, even though I am very confident in saying that my teammates are all very talented and can complement each other's abilities. I therefore feel that the routine we added for resolving conflicts is a valuable addition.

As for the lectures this week I found them informative and they have made me want to get an even clearer understanding of scrum. This will be one of my goals for this course, to not only understand it theoretically and use it in my work, but to also understand why it's used in the industry and if there are any potential pitfalls with it.

I was unfortunately unable to attend the Lego exercises that were held this week. I asked my teammates what they learned and quickly understood that the exercise was very informative and also a lot of fun. In order to not miss out on any more useful information and valuable time to practise the skills we learn in the lectures I will try to be better at organizing my week so I will miss fewer exercises.

Next week our focus will be to find a project that the whole group can get behind developing and to start planning features and what tools we will use. We started discussing what programming language everyone felt comfortable with and I imagine that we have more to talk about regarding this.
